

Marina Abramovic List Of Works

Introduction: The Unforgettable Art of Marina Abramović

Marina Abramović is widely regarded as the grandmother of performance art. For over five decades, she has pushed the boundaries of the human body and mind, creating works that are as shocking as they are profound. When exploring a Marina Abramovic list of works, one quickly realizes that her art is not simply a collection of objects but a series of transformative experiences. From the raw endurance tests of her early career to the deeply meditative interactive installations of later years, Abramović has forever changed the way we think about art, presence, and the relationship between performer and audience.

To understand the breadth of her practice, it helps to step through her most seminal pieces in roughly chronological order. While any Marina Abramovic list of works will inevitably be incomplete due to the sheer volume of her performances, the following selections represent the peaks of her creative journey, each one a milestone in the evolution of performance art.

Early Works and the Rhythm Series (1973-1974)

Rhythm 10 (1973)

Abramović began her exploration of risk and ritual with Rhythm 10. In this piece, she laid out twenty knives on a wooden floor. She quickly stabbed the spaces between her spread fingers, recording the action on audio. After each mistake, she would replay the tape and attempt to replicate the exact movements, creating a loop of repetition and pain. This piece introduced two recurring themes: the body as a site of endurance and the use of audio documentation to trap time.

Rhythm 5 (1974)

In Rhythm 5, Abramović constructed a large five-pointed wooden star, soaked it in gasoline, and set it on fire. She then lay down inside the star, intending to use the fire as a symbol of political cleansing. However, the flames consumed the oxygen, causing her to lose consciousness. The audience only intervened when the fire threatened to burn her. This piece marked a pivotal realization: the body has limits, and the artist cannot always stay in control.

Rhythm 0 (1974)

Perhaps the most famous of the early works, Rhythm 0 is a cornerstone of any Marina Abramovic list of works. She placed 72 objects on a table, including a rose, a feather, a scalpel, a gun, and a single bullet. She then stood motionless for six hours, inviting the audience to use the objects on her body in any way they wished. As the hours passed, the crowd grew bolder—cutting her clothes, pricking her skin, and eventually placing the loaded gun to her head. The piece ended when a fight broke out among the audience. Abramović later said she was willing to give her life for the artwork. Rhythm 0 starkly revealed the dynamics of power, trust, and human nature.

The Collaboration with Ulay (1976-1988)

From 1976 to 1988, Abramović worked with the German artist Ulay (Frank Uwe Laysiepen). Their partnership produced some of the most iconic performances of the late 20th century, exploring dual identities, balance, and the limits of physical togetherness.

Relation in Space (1976)

The duo ran naked toward each other at high speed, colliding repeatedly. By recording the impact on video, they created a visceral metaphor for the meeting of two energies. The performance was simple but physically brutal, laying the groundwork for their symbiotic practice.

Rest Energy (1980)

In Rest Energy, Abramović held a drawn bow while Ulay pointed an arrow directly at her heart. They leaned into the tension, with microphones amplifying their breathing and heartbeats. For four minutes and ten seconds, the audience sat in absolute silence. The piece became a symbol of complete trust and the knife-edge between life and death.

The Lovers: The Great Wall Walk (1988)

Their final collaborative work was monumental. Each artist began walking from opposite ends of the Great Wall of China, covering over 2,500 kilometers. They met in the middle, embracing, but this meeting also marked their farewell. The walk was a spiritual and emotional conclusion to their twelve-year relationship. This work remains one of the most moving chapters in any Marina Abramovic list of works.

Solo Works of the 1990s: Balkan Baroque and Beyond

Balkan Baroque (1997)

Representing Serbia at the Venice Biennale, Abramović created a powerful installation that won the Golden Lion. She sat on a mountain of fresh cow bones, scrubbing them with a brush and soap, while singing folk songs from her childhood. The performance addressed the horrors of the Yugoslav Wars and the futility of trying to wash away blood and memory. It remains one of her most politically charged works.

The House with the Ocean View (2002)

For twelve days, Abramović lived in a three-room wooden structure built inside the Sean Kelly Gallery in New York. She did not speak, eat, or move beyond her minimal platform. The only sustenance was water and a strict diet. The audience could climb a ladder to a platform near her, looking into her eyes. This piece intensified her exploration of presence, time, and the non-verbal exchange between artist and viewer.

The Museum of Modern Art Retrospective and "The Artist Is Present" (2010)

No Marina Abramovic list of works is complete without discussing her landmark 2010 MoMA retrospective. The exhibition reprised many of her past performances, performed by younger artists trained in her methods. But the centerpiece was a new performance: The Artist Is Present.

The Artist Is Present (2010)

For 736 hours and 30 minutes, Abramović sat silently in a wooden chair in MoMA's atrium. One by one, visitors could sit across from her and meet her gaze for as long as they wished. The performance became a cultural phenomenon, attracting celebrities and ordinary people alike, many of whom wept. Abramović herself sat in stillness, without food or bathroom breaks during daily hours, achieving a level of endurance that became legendary. The piece was a profound meditation on intimacy, attention, and the power of simple human connection.

Later Works and Ongoing Legacy

Generator (2014)

In this interactive installation, visitors wore noise-cancelling headphones and were blindfolded. They moved through a dark, partitioned space, searching for each other through touch. The piece stripped away vision, forcing a purely physical and intuitive engagement. It reflected Abramović's ongoing interest in sensory deprivation and heightened awareness.

The Cleaner (2017)

Despite her advancing age, Abramović continues to create. In 2017, she performed The Cleaner at the Louvre, where she donned a white lab coat and scrubbed a human skeleton on a table for hours. The performance was a meditation on mortality and the artist's role as a spiritual cleaner of collective trauma.

Seven Deaths (2020)

In a video and performance series, Abramović re-enacted seven famous death scenes from cinema—including those from Psycho and The Exorcist—each with herself as the protagonist. Using opera and digital technology, she turned the ultimate human fear into art, once again confronting the boundary between life and death.

Thematic Threads Across the Marina Abramović List of Works

Looking at the full Marina Abramovic list of works, several consistent themes emerge. The body is never a metaphor—it is the literal material. She tests its limits through fasting, exposure, pain, and stillness. Time becomes a medium: the slow passing of hours in The Artist Is Present or the years of preparation for The Lovers. Trust and danger are constant companions, from the arrow in Rest Energy to the loaded gun in Rhythm 0. And the audience is not a passive observer but an active participant, often forced to make moral choices.

Her work also challenges the art market. Performance art is ephemeral, and documentation is imperfect. Abramović has experimented with re-performance, allowing new bodies to inhabit her works, while also insisting on the value of presence over ownership. This has sparked debates in the art world about authenticity and the commodification of experience.

How to Approach a Marina Abramović List of Works

If you are new to her practice, it is best to start with the video documentation of Rhythm 0, then move through the Ulay collaborations, and finally watch the MoMA footage of The Artist Is Present. Many of her works are available online through museum archives, YouTube, and streaming platforms. Several books, including her memoir Walk Through Walls, provide essential context.

When compiling your own Marina Abramovic list of works, consider arranging them by chronology, theme, or technique. She has created works that involve fire, water, silence, blood, bones, and human hair. She has walked walls, sat in chairs, scrubbed floors, and stared into strangers’ eyes. Each piece is a unique artifact of her relentless inquiry into what it means to be alive.

Conclusion

Marina Abramović’s career is a testament to the power of endurance, vulnerability, and radical presence. A Marina Abramovic list of works is not merely a catalog of performances—it is a map of human experience drawn with blood, silence, and trust. From the violent tests of the 1970s to the serene intimacy of her later works, she has consistently redefined the possibilities of art. Her legacy will continue to influence generations of artists who see the body not as a canvas, but as a battleground, a temple, and a home. As long as there are people willing to sit in stillness and truly see one another, her work will remain alive.
