

How To Trademark A Name

Understanding the Importance of Trademarking a Name

Your business name is often the first point of contact with customers. It carries your reputation, your brand identity, and your promise of quality. Without legal protection, anyone could use a similar name, causing confusion and potentially damaging the trust you have built. Learning how to trademark a name is not just a legal technicality—it is a strategic move to safeguard your brand’s future. A registered trademark gives you exclusive rights to use that name in connection with your goods or services, and it allows you to take legal action against infringers. This article will walk you through the entire process, from initial checks to final registration, so you can secure your brand with confidence.

Many entrepreneurs and small business owners postpone trademarking because they believe it is too complex or expensive. However, the process is more straightforward than you might think, and the benefits far outweigh the costs. Whether you are starting a new venture or rebranding an existing one, understanding the steps involved ensures that you avoid common pitfalls. This guide covers everything you need to know about how to trademark a name, including conducting a trademark search, filing your application, and responding to office actions.

Step 1: Determine If Your Name Is Eligible for Trademark Protection

Not every name can be trademarked. The United States Patent and Trademark Office (USPTO) and similar agencies in other countries have specific requirements. The name must be distinctive and used in commerce. Generic terms like “Shoes” for a shoe store cannot be trademarked because they describe the product itself. Descriptive names, such as “Quick Lube” for an oil change service, are also difficult to register unless they have acquired secondary meaning over time.

The most trademark-friendly names are arbitrary (e.g., “Apple” for computers), fanciful (e.g., “Kodak”), or suggestive (e.g., “Netflix” hinting at internet + flicks). Before you proceed, evaluate whether your name falls into one of these categories. If it is merely descriptive, you may need to build a strong brand presence first to prove that consumers associate the name with your specific business. When you learn how to trademark a name, the first lesson is to choose a name that is inherently distinctive.

Conduct a Thorough Trademark Search

Before filing an application, you must ensure that no one else is already using a similar name for related goods or services. A preliminary search can save you time, money, and legal headaches. Start with the USPTO’s Trademark Electronic Search System (TESS) for US filings, or the equivalent database in your country. Search not only for exact matches but also for phonetically similar names, misspellings, and names with similar meanings.

- Use the USPTO’s free search tool to check pending and registered trademarks.
- Search for the name in your specific class of goods or services. A name used for clothing may not conflict with the same name used for software.
- Also search common law uses—check business registries, domain names, social media handles, and even local directories. Even unregistered marks can have rights.

If you find a similar mark that could cause confusion, you may need to modify your name or choose a different one. A professional trademark attorney can perform a more comprehensive clearance search and provide an opinion on the risk of conflict. The extra cost is worth the peace of mind.

Step 2: Understand the Different Types of Trademark Applications

When you learn how to trademark a name, you will encounter two main types of applications: “use in commerce” and “intent to use.” If you are already selling products or services under that name, you can file a use-based application. You will need to provide a specimen showing the name used in the marketplace, such as a product label, website screenshot, or advertisement.

If you have not yet launched but plan to use the name in the future, you can file an intent-to-use application. This reserves your rights while you prepare to enter the market. The USPTO will issue a Notice of Allowance, and you will have up to six months (extendable) to show that you are actually using the mark in commerce. Both paths lead to registration, but the timing and requirements differ.

Choosing the Correct Filing Basis

For US applicants, the filing basis also depends on whether you are using the mark in interstate commerce, which is required for federal registration. If you only operate locally, you may still qualify if your business affects interstate commerce (e.g., selling online to customers in other states). Alternatively, you can rely on a foreign registration if you have a home country application. The how to trademark a name process is similar in many jurisdictions, but always check local laws.

Step 3: Prepare and File Your Trademark Application

You can file online through the USPTO’s Trademark Electronic Application System (TEAS). There are three levels: TEAS Plus, TEAS Reduced Fee (RF), and TEAS Regular. TEAS Plus has the lowest fee but requires a precise identification of goods/services from the USPTO’s manual. TEAS Regular costs more but allows more flexibility in descriptions.

When preparing your application, you must provide:

1. The name you want to trademark exactly as it appears.
2. The class(es) of goods or services. Each class incurs an additional fee, so be strategic—list only what you actually offer or plan to offer.
3. A clear drawing of the mark if it includes a design element. For a standard character mark (just text), you can simply type the name.
4. Specimens of use if filing a use-based application.
5. The filing fee, which ranges from $250 to $350 per class for TEAS applications.

After submission, you will receive a serial number and can track your application status via the Trademark Status and Document Retrieval (TSDR) system. The USPTO will assign an examining attorney to review your application. This review typically takes four to six months, but timelines vary.

Responding to Office Actions

It is common to receive an Office Action—a letter from the USPTO raising issues with your application. These could be minor (e.g., clarifying the description of goods) or substantive (e.g., likelihood of confusion with an existing mark). You must respond within six months, or your application will be abandoned. Many first-time applicants hire a trademark attorney at this stage to craft a persuasive response. Understanding how to trademark a name includes knowing how to navigate these hurdles effectively.

International Considerations: How to Step 4: Publication and Opposition Period

Once the examining attorney approves your application, it is published in the Official Gazette for 30 days. During this window, third parties can oppose your registration if they believe it will harm their rights. Most applications go unchallenged, but you should be prepared. An opposition proceeding can be expensive, but having a strong mark reduces the risk.

If no opposition is filed, the USPTO will register your mark. For intent-to-use applications, you will first receive a Notice of Allowance, followed by registration after you submit a Statement of Use. The entire process from filing to registration can take 12 to 18 months. Patience is key when you learn how to trademark a name.

Step 5: Maintain Your Trademark Rights

A trademark registration is not permanent. You must enforce your rights and file periodic maintenance documents. Between the fifth and sixth year after registration, you must file a Section 8 Declaration of Continued Use, along with a specimen. Between the ninth and tenth year, you file a combined Section 8 and Section 9 renewal. These filings keep your mark alive.

Additionally, you should monitor the marketplace for potential infringers. If someone uses a confusingly similar name, you may need to send a cease-and-desist letter or initiate legal action. The strength of your trademark depends on your vigilance. The more you understand how to trademark a name, the better you can protect your investment over the long term.

Common Mistakes to Avoid When Trademarking a Name

Many first-time applicants make errors that delay or derail their registration. Here are pitfalls to avoid:

- Skipping the search: Rushing to file without a proper clearance search often leads to rejection or opposition.
- Choosing a weak mark: Names that are too descriptive or generic are hard to register and even harder to enforce.

- Incorrect classification: Listing too many classes increases costs unnecessarily; listing too few leaves gaps in protection.
- Using the wrong filing basis: Filing as “use in commerce” before you actually have sales can invalidate your application.
- Ignoring deadlines: Missing a response deadline can result in abandonment. Set calendar reminders.
- DIY without research: While you can file yourself, the USPTO’s rules are nuanced. Many successful filers consult an attorney at least for the search and initial application.

Trademark a Name Abroad

A US trademark protects you only within the United States. If you plan to expand globally, you need protection in each country. The Madrid Protocol allows you to file a single international application, designating multiple member countries. This streamlines the process but does not guarantee registration—each country reviews the application independently.

Alternatively, you can file directly with national trademark offices. When learning how to trademark a name internationally, prioritize your key markets. Costs vary, and some countries have different classification systems (e.g., the Nice classification is widely used, but goods/services descriptions may differ). Always work with local counsel for complex filings.

The Cost of Trademarking a Name

Fees depend on the number of classes, the filing basis, and whether you hire an attorney. As of this writing, USPTO fees are:

- TEAS Plus: $250 per class
- TEAS RF: $275 per class
- TEAS Regular: $350 per class

Attorney fees vary widely but typically range from $500 to $2,000 for a straightforward application. Additional costs may arise for responding to Office Actions, conducting comprehensive searches, or fighting oppositions. While it may seem like a significant expense, the value of a registered trademark often far exceeds the cost, especially if your brand grows.

Conclusion

Trademarking a name is one of the most important legal steps you can take to protect your brand identity. By following the steps outlined above—conducting a thorough search, choosing a distinctive name, filing the correct application, and maintaining your registration—you can secure exclusive rights and build a foundation for long-term success. Remember that how to trademark a name is not a one-time event but an ongoing process of vigilance and enforcement. Whether you handle it yourself or work with an attorney, the effort you invest today will pay dividends in brand recognition, customer trust, and legal protection for years to come.
