This guide provides a comprehensive analysis of Act 4, breaking down each scene, key themes, character motivations, and literary devices to help you understand why this act is crucial to Shakespeare's masterpiece.

Act 4 Overview: From Grief to Action

Act 4 of Hamlet is a whirlwind of events. It opens immediately after Polonius's death, with Gertrude reporting the murder to Claudius. The king, fearing for his own life, decides to send Hamlet to England. We witness Hamlet's stoic acceptance of his fate, the heart-wrenching madness of Ophelia, Laertes's fiery return for revenge, and Claudius's manipulative plot to ensure Hamlet's death. This act compresses time and accelerates the plot, transforming the play from a tragedy of delay into a tragedy of action. The keyword Hamlet Sparknotes Act 4 often searches for this precise turning point, where Hamlet moves from "To be or not to be" to "The readiness is all."

Scene-by-Scene Breakdown of Hamlet Act 4

Act 4, Scene 1: The King's Fear

In the immediate aftermath of Polonius's murder, Gertrude reports to Claudius in a state of panic. She describes Hamlet as “mad as the sea and wind.” Claudius’s first reaction is not grief for Polonius but fear for his own safety. He immediately orders Rosencrantz and Guildenstern to find Hamlet and recover the body. This scene underscores Claudius’s Machiavellian nature: he is a politician first, a man second. He recognizes that Hamlet is now a direct threat to his throne. The king’s line, “It had been so with us, had we been there,” reveals his chilling awareness that he was the intended target. For those reading Hamlet Sparknotes Act 4, this scene marks Claudius’s shift from a guilty usurper to a desperate schemer.

Act 4, Scene 2: Hamlet’s Defiance

Rosencrantz and Guildenstern confront Hamlet, demanding to know where Polonius’s body is hidden. Hamlet mocks them, refusing to give a straight answer. He calls Rosencrantz a “sponge” that soaks up the king’s favor. This is a crucial moment for Hamlet’s character: he is now openly hostile to the court spies. His wordplay, “The body is with the king, but the king is not with the body,” is deliberately cryptic. This line can be interpreted as Hamlet’s philosophical musing on death and kingship, but it also serves to frustrate his pursuers. The scene ends with Hamlet being led away, but he remains mentally unbroken. This tension between physical captivity and intellectual freedom is a frequent topic in Hamlet Sparknotes Act 4 discussions.

Act 4, Scene 3: Claudius Sentences Hamlet

Claudius questions Hamlet in court, surrounded by his attendants. Hamlet finally reveals that Polonius is “at supper”—not eating, but being eaten by worms. This macabre joke about the cycle of death is classic Hamlet: darkly humorous and deeply philosophical. Claudius then announces that Hamlet must sail to England for his safety. Alone, Claudius reveals his true plan: he has sent sealed letters with Rosencrantz and Guildenstern ordering the English king to execute Hamlet upon arrival. This is the first time Claudius actively conspires to murder Hamlet, moving beyond his silent guilt. The political machinations in this scene are essential to any Hamlet Sparknotes Act 4 summary, as they set the stage for the international intrigue that follows.

Act 4, Scene 4: Hamlet’s Soliloquy on Action

On his way to the ship, Hamlet encounters a Norwegian captain leading Fortinbras’s army to Poland. The captain explains that the army is fighting over a “little patch of ground” worth nothing. This encounter triggers Hamlet’s final soliloquy of the play: “How all occasions do inform against me.” Hamlet compares himself to Fortinbras, a prince who leads thousands of men to die for a trivial cause. Hamlet feels ashamed that he, with a far greater motive (his father’s murder), has failed to act. The soliloquy ends with his resolve: “O, from this time forth, my thoughts be bloody, or be nothing worth!” This is a pivotal moment for critics analyzing Hamlet Sparknotes Act 4 because it shows Hamlet’s psychological shift from paralysis to determination. However, his “bloody thoughts” are still just thoughts—he has yet to take action.

Act 4, Scene 5: Ophelia’s Madness and Laertes’s Rage

This is one of the most heartbreaking scenes in the play. Ophelia enters, singing bawdy ballads and distributing flowers. Her madness is fragmented and symbolic. She sings of a “baker’s daughter” and a man who is “dead and gone.” The flowers she distributes have symbolic meanings: rosemary for remembrance, pansies for thoughts, fennel for flattery, columbines for ingratitude. Importantly, she keeps rue for herself, a symbol of regret. Meanwhile, Laertes storms the castle with a mob of supporters, demanding justice for his father’s death. Claudius, ever the politician, calms Laertes by redirecting his anger toward Hamlet. This scene introduces the theme of revenge as a contagious disease that infects the entire court. For anyone searching Hamlet Sparknotes Act 4, this scene is a masterclass in dramatic tension, combining pathos with political intrigue.

Act 4, Scene 6: News from Hamlet

Horatio receives a letter from Hamlet. The letter reveals that Hamlet’s ship was attacked by pirates, and he has escaped. He asks Horatio to deliver letters to the king and to come to him quickly. This scene is brief but crucial: it reintroduces hope for Hamlet’s survival. The pirate attack is a deus ex machina, but it also reinforces Hamlet’s resourcefulness. He managed to escape certain death in England, a feat that suggests fate is on his side—or at least that he is not meant to die yet. This scene is often included in condensed Hamlet Sparknotes Act 4 summaries as the turning point where Hamlet regains control of his destiny.

Act 4, Scene 7: Claudius and Laertes Conspire

Claudius receives Hamlet’s letter announcing his return. He then manipulates Laertes into plotting Hamlet’s murder. Claudius carefully feeds Laertes’s anger by comparing their shared enemy: Laertes lost his father, and Claudius lost his intended victim. The king suggests a fencing match between Laertes and Hamlet. Laertes will use a sharpened, unblunted foil. To ensure success, Laertes plans to poison the tip of his sword. As a backup plan, Claudius will poison a cup of wine for Hamlet to drink. This scene demonstrates Claudius's complexity: he is a murderer, but a brilliant strategist. The conspiracy is interrupted by Gertrude, who brings news of Ophelia's death by drowning. Ophelia's death is reported in a beautiful, lyrical speech that describes her garland of flowers and her "mermaid-like" descent into the water. Her death is ruled a suicide, but the ambiguity remains. This scene contains the seeds of the final tragedy, making it a favorite topic for detailed Hamlet Sparknotes Act 4 analysis.

Key Themes in Hamlet Act 4

The Corrosive Nature of Revenge

Act 4 shows how revenge spreads like a disease. Hamlet wants revenge on Claudius. Laertes wants revenge on Hamlet. Claudius wants revenge on Hamlet (for attempting to expose him). Even Fortinbras, in the background, is seeking revenge for his father's loss of lands. The play suggests that revenge is a cycle that destroys everyone it touches. Ophelia is an innocent victim of this cycle.

Action vs. Inaction

This theme is at the heart of Hamlet Sparknotes Act 4 analysis. Hamlet has finally resolved to act, but his resolution comes at a high cost. His delay has already cost Polonius his life and Ophelia her sanity. The contrast between Hamlet and Laertes is stark: Laertes acts immediately, while Hamlet contemplates. Shakespeare seems to ask: which is wiser? Laertes's impulsive revenge is easily manipulated by Claudius, while Hamlet's measured approach, though slow, is more just.

Madness and Sanity

Ophelia's madness is genuine and tragic, a sharp contrast to Hamlet's "antic disposition" which is largely feigned. Her madness is expressed through song and flower symbolism, which reveals her grief and her fractured psyche. This raises questions about the nature of madness: is it a release from the pain of reality, or a complete destruction of the self?

Power and Manipulation

Claudius is at his most manipulative in Act 4. He uses Laertes's grief and anger as tools for his own ends. He never admits to murdering his brother, but he skillfully frames Hamlet as the common enemy. This political maneuvering shows how power corrupts and how language can be used to control others.

Character Development in Act 4

- Hamlet: Becomes more resolute, but also more isolated. His intellectual humor remains, but it is darker. He is no longer the indecisive prince; he has accepted his fate and is ready to die.
- Claudius: Reveals his full villainy. He is now a cold-blooded conspirator willing to kill again. His guilt from Act 3 is forgotten in the face of survival.
- Gertrude: Remains passive but shows genuine grief for Ophelia and concern for Hamlet. Her loyalties are torn, and she is largely unaware of Claudius's plots.
- Ophelia: Her descent into madness is a direct result of the violence around her. She is the play's most tragic figure, a symbol of innocence destroyed by political intrigue.
- Laertes: A foil to Hamlet. He is passionate, impulsive, and easily manipulated. His rage makes him a tool for Claudius.

Important Symbols and Literary Devices in Act 4

Flowers as Symbols

Ophelia's distribution of flowers is rich in symbolism. Each flower carries a specific meaning: rosemary for remembrance, pansies for thoughts, fennel for flattery, columbines for ingratitude, rue for regret, and daisies for innocence. This floral language was well understood by Elizabethan audiences and adds a layer of tragic irony to her madness.

The Pirate Attack

This event is a turning point. It symbolizes the unpredictability of fate. Just when Claudius thinks he has eliminated Hamlet, fortune intervenes. The pirates act as an instrument of destiny, returning Hamlet to Denmark for the final act.

Ophelia's Drowning

Her death is described as both beautiful and tragic. The description of her floating garlands and her “mermaid-like” appearance suggests a kind of pagan death ritual. The ambiguity of whether her death was accidental or suicide reflects the play's themes of uncertainty and the blurred line between fate and choice.
